PHILLIPSBURG, KANSAS, THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1893.

$1.50 IN ADVANCE

A TEST CASE.

We like occasionally to test the relative merits of the Phillips County papers and with this object in view we make the following proposition, viz:

Cut this advertisement out of the HERALD and it will be good for One Dollar on any one purchase amounting to Ten Dollars ($10.00) or over, if presented at our store any time before The 15th Day of February 1893.

Count it then as good as an extra $1.00 green-back in your pocket-book if you are in need of Mens, Youths or Boys Clothing, Boots, Shoes, Hats, Caps,

And choose to give our immense assortment the preference on this account. Mothers are especially reminded that we are able to sell you a good boy's suit from Two Dollars and Seventy-five cents upwards. Everything in our House is marked in plain figures. One price to all.

Touching Incident of the Grand Army Parade in Washington.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 18.—An incident of the Grand Army parade in Washington last September illustrates the touching simplicity of the whole life and character of ex-President Hayes, whose death was received here this morning with expressions of great surprise.

Standing in a group of distinguished officials in the midst of the reviewing stand fronting the treasury department, the most noted one of the foreign ministers had his attention called to General Hayes, who, with head uncovered and florid face thrown well back so that the sunlight fell upon it and his snow-white locks, the ex-president was trudging along with precise martial step, keeping time with his old comrades of the state of Ohio. It was entirely unaffected and caused the foreign minister to remark:

"What a spectacle for the old world is this. By this act today your ex-president has demonstrated to the world the stability of your democracy and simplicity of your whole political system."

Ex-President Hayes' part in the memorable parade that day was to him a source of great personal pride. It seemed to give him more pleasure than any other event of his whole life to march patiently along in line with men who had carried the muskets in the regiments, obeying strictly the order of his post commander.

A contemplation of the life of President Hayes during his occupancy of the white house invariably carries the mind back to the story in the early days of the government, when President-elect Jefferson rode to the white-house unattended on the morning of the inauguration, and, hitching his horse, walked in and quietly took possession of the affairs of the republic. Grant's life was in many ways simple and unostentatious, but it carried with it a certain military pomp and pageantry derived from martial training which was wholly lacking in President Hayes.

There is hardly a citizen of Washington who resided here during the Hayes administration who does not recall the quiet daily life and unobtrusive ways of the ex-president. His habit of walking to church with his wife every Sunday morning, when the weather was bright and balmy, bowing to those who passed him on the street, and after the service was closed greeting the members of the congregation who crowded about his pew, will long be remembered here as without parallel in presidential life.

President Hayes was something of an equestrian. He was not a bold rider, and always selected the gentlest he could find. His favorite daily rides were taken to the soldiers' home grounds in the vicinity of Washington, where he frequently halted and conversed with strange veterans who reclined on seats that lined either side of the broad driveways of the grounds.

General Boynton, the veteran Ohio journalist, was asked by the Daily News correspondent for some expression on the ex-president with whose life he was so familiar and replied: "You ask about the life of ex-President Hayes at the white house? The whole atmosphere of the administration of President Hayes was that of a plain, unostentatious but still most dignified American home. Mrs. Hayes was a woman of uncommon power to charm and interest all who approached her, and she was universally respected and esteemed by all classes of society in Washington.

"The president, while always dignified and fully appreciating at all times what belonged to his office, was approachable and of a most social disposition. The younger members of the family were greatly liked by all who visited the house, and while they were continually sought for by the highest official life of the capital their heads were never turned by the attention showed them, and they remained to the last charming illustrations of the best type of an American family. Of this household and of President Harrison's family it can be truthfully said that they have represented in this high place of the nation all that is best and purest and of highest repute among the homes of the republic."

No petitioner, however humble ever failed with an audience with President Hayes at the white house. He was a patient listener and tenderly responsive to every appeal. The Hayes receptions and other social affairs were marvels of simplicity. The close friends and associates of the family were from every respectable walk of life.

The plain citizen of Fremont who came to the capital and called to see "Rutherford and Lucy" was received with the same neighborly cordiality and interest that obtained in the best society circles of Fremont. "The annoying press comment that has been made on the apparent seclusion which surrounded Mr. Hayes since his retirement from office," said a friend this morning, "can be traced in a large degree to Mr. Hayes' plain life and his unwillingness to give up the neighborly and cherished associations of his country home for the higher social field which was always opened invitingly before him."
